The Wall Street Journal was the first to report the investigation, which was first reported to the FTC in December. The FTC has been investigating Google's practices for the past several months, though it has yet to make any findings. If it does find that Google is violating antitrust laws, the company would face a fine of up to $5 billion in the EU, according to the EU's antitrust laws. "It's up to the regulator to impose fines, not the court," a spokesperson told the FT. If found guilty, Google would be forced to change how its maps and search works to avoid anticompetitive behaviors, according to the FT's report. The investigation could also open the door to an EU-China trade deal, which would be positive for Google. If it can avoid a fine, Google would be one of China's biggest international tech firms, and it would be able to help its clients to access the Chinese market. If it gets a fine, however, it would likely have to cease or severely limit its search and cloud offerings in China. The investigation would come at a time when both the EU and US are investigating Google's practices. The FTC has been investigating the company since May, and it has fined Google a record $22.5 million.
